howling at the moon, a moth's wing beating against the light, or even the hum of electrical wires My grandmother lived on a farm in South Georgia I remember childhood visits, trying to go to sleep in the sticky hot and scary darkness of a summer night with a chorus of frogs and crickets serenading, the occasional sharp howl of a cat

The Road to the Spring - Project MUSE

Once I thought I had it when the moon Stood up young and white behind the grass, Ah, but it was gone again so soon, On the scented hill I heard it pass! Whisper of the wind along the sage— That was it where once the lupine stirred— At the moth-hour once I heard it plain, Once But I forget the

Madison Julius Cawein - poems

A moon, moth-white, that through long mists of fleece Moves amber-girt into a bulk of black, And, lost to vision, rims the black with froth: A love that swept its moon, like some great moth, Across the heaven of her soul's young peace; And, smoothly passing, in the clouds did cease Of time, through which its burning light comes back
